Peter is all about love

London-based singer Peter French returns to Scotland next weekend to play an exclusive concert in Dundee. He tells Jennifer Cosgrove why this homecoming is so important . . .

Peter French is a nervy and articulate young man who played to a packed Rose Bruford College student audience on Friday evening. He is about to perform his first solo Edinburgh Festival Fringe show at the Traverse Theatre.

“I was all set up to do it and then 9/11 happened and everything changed. After 9/11, the agency called to say the situation in New York wasn’t terrible: they wanted people going out and we were deciding to go there. They said I could still come out and it would be wonderful.”

Rather than dwelling on what could have been, he says he was “utterly focused on my training with him, and that something took over inside of me and I wouldn’t say I became obsessed but I became so strange – something took over. I wouldn’t have played that gig and Ian wouldn’t have played that gig, so I went back to Ian and it was very important. I had to work on my craft. I am going to have to create this drink to start. It was extraordinary.”
